VISIT TO THE PARK.

The Ladies' Presentation of a Portrait of General Scott.

&c. &c. &c.

Thousands of our citizens, whose the holiday of yesterday emancipated from their usual diurnal labors, hailed themselves of the opportunity to frequent the lobby of the Metropolitan Hotel, in hopes of seeing visiting Lieutenant General. Nor were they doomed to disappointment, inasmuch as the General was several times called to the balcony, where the spectators were enabled to gratify their longing for even a glance at the hero, whose popularity is as undying as the fruits of his military genius. It is almost unnecessary to say, so readily may the fact be conjectured, that the thronging in front of the hotel windows and on either side of hotel entrance was throughout the day thorough with admirers.

In the morning the General breakfasted privately at the residence of a friend in the city, after which Mrs. Grant proceeded with a lady friend to the Park, in the landau which the General has purchased.

Between eleven and three o'clock the honors of a marching salute were tendered the General by the regiments of militia on parade. For some reason this parade was not a simultaneous display of the troops parading.

Each of the four regiments selected its own time marching, and, in consequence, passed the hotel in succession order. The General was honored none the less, however, and from the balcony of the hotel made acknowledgments to the soldiery, in whose ranks he marshaled a number of his own vet-rans.

Countless a stream of visitors besieged him in the park and hallway of the hotel, many in their eagerness venturing their anxiety to get the better of their politeness. It was almost impossible to prevent the crowd from intruding after him into his private apartments, nor to be refused for occasional rest and relaxation. Allured him of their well wishes, and not a few gave a personal character to their good dispositions by sentimental ravishments. A very few of these only has been able to accept, owing to the intended brief duration of his visit. Among those who called upon the General during the day were Admiral Farragut, General Heintzelman, General Borgeas, General M. D. Hull, Colonel Bennett, and other officers of the Third Vermont National regiment; A. T. Stewart, Frederick W. Wetmore, Isaac Harbois, and Mayor Wood, of Brooklyn.

In the afternoon a carriage party was formed for a ride in the Park. The General was carried for by Mr. Jones, while Major Leland escorted Colonel Bladaw and members of the General's staff. A couple of hours were spent in a most exhilarating ride through our rue de la ville. After dinner at the hotel the General and staff proceeded to Union square, where he was presented with a portrait of General Scott, the gift of a number of his admirers in this city. The presentation of this picture of the "oldest to the greatest general in the world" was attended with a collation and appropriate music. The picture had been previously shown to the General, and it is his intention to gratify a universal interest by having a portrait of himself painted as a personification of his life.

The brevity of his stay has precluded any formal program for the General's entertainment or amusement. To-day he will dine with Mr. A. T. Stewart.

Lieutenant General and President Johnson.
Washington, Feb. 22, 1866.

A National Intelligencer feels warranted in concluding the representations which have been extending since the late war, that some attention of fact as between President and Lieutenant General Grant was involved, in consequence of the suppression and revival of the United Examiner.
